It has come to my attention that this regained popularity in recent weeks. As the author, I'm deeply humbled by the support in the form of reblogs and likes even despite the crass language. I'm not Lakota or from the areas of these tribes. I'm from a Pueblo in New Mexico (shout-out to the Pueblo camp at standing Rock!) And Navajo Nation. I made this post at a tumultuous time in my life when I had accrued so much capital and privilege in the white man's world. This is one of those things that looks cool and funny but it's really not. Granted, I don't work with large reptiles. But I do work with large dangerous animals. You don't turn your back on a creature like this, especially when they know it's feeding time. It doesn't matter if they were raised in captivity or not. They're still wild animals, and can bite and attack, even if they aren't meaning to hurt you specifically. There should always be separation between the keeper and an animal that could rip your arm clean off. Those tongs also don't look long or sturdy enough, but again, not a large reptile expert.

gaelicfalcon Follow

I have even more bad news. I looked up this facility, and absolutely

I have even more bad news. I looked up this facility, and shockingly it's not AZA accredited /s. It also appears to be a fancy roadside zoo, as it offers all sorts of hilariously dangerous excursions where you can hold and pet reptiles and amphibians. They started as an exotic pet store and changed their name to make people think they are a legitimate educational facility, but even on their own website they have pictures of their employees and guests holding gators and komodo dragons. Don't follow them on Tiktok or give them money; they are not caring for these animals responsibly and admit to breeding "world's first" animals which means they are not even trying to support legitimate conservation efforts.

ordinaryredtail Follow

Yeah, this is honestly what I expected.

kaijutegu Follow

Just a heads up- they're not holding Komodo dragons. Those are water monitors. The distinction is REALLY important because until a couple years ago, Komodos in the US were under the strict purview of the AZA. Nobody outside the AZA had one, despite everybody wanting one. Now that's changed. There's one Komodo outside the AZA. She had to be spayed due to life-threatening egg binding (so she couldn't be used for the species survival plan) and she's in an amazing educational facility just outside of Chicago, but that did set a precedent for Komodos being scrubbed out of AZA programs and placed in non-AZA facilities.

And the less reputable places absolutely know this and they are salivating over the prospect. Komodo dragons are pretty much the one reptile there isn't a black market for in the US. The export and breeding is too tightly controlled, and they're too well-known to slip under the radar. But places like this do want you to think they could have a Komodo dragon. They want to be seen as an actual conservation effort- they want the court of public opinion to be swayed towards them. So it's important to be aware that nowhere (unless it's the Wildlife Discovery Center in IL or an AZA facility) in the US has a Komodo. It's important to know what you're looking at, because places like this do not need to have Komodo dragons, and the public assuming they do/should is potentially dangerous for the species.

Although... I do think it's kinda funny that despite being an "educational facility" people walk away from their website thinking they have an animal they actually do not. Kinda shows they're not really on messaging target, doesn't it.

Secondly, I am a large reptile expert and my conclusion here is the same as the non-experts (because the folks who have chimed in have eyes): this is incredibly dangerous do not try this at home. You should never be that close to an untaped alligator's mouth. If the mouth is banded, that's one thing, but that animal could easily have taken her face off. She already has it keyed up with a feeding response, and she's using the stimulus (feeding tongs) to put physical pressure on the animal while trying to direct it to something other than a feed. Alligators are really easily trainable. Once they get a stimulus or target in their head, it is in there to STAY. Redirecting with the feeding target is dangerous because when the alligator sees that, the only thing going through its head is "FOOD. NOW." This is really irresponsible!

I also want to point out that handling reptiles isn't necessarily a bad thing. It's one of those experiences that can be done really well or really poorly. I'm actually a pretty big proponent of reptile meet 'n' greets because they get the public interacting with stigmatized animals in a positive light. This is especially true for snakes in general and reptiles native to a place- we need people to understand how important they are for the ecosystems in which they evolved. Getting up close and personal and doing some light handling is a really good way to help people learn and love. But you have to do it sensibly. It's never a good idea to do that with amphibians; they're far too delicate. Alligators- specifically young ones- are honestly a-ok to do this with, if it's done correctly and with the animal's comfort in mind. The mouths must be banded (this does not hurt them) and they need to be able to have space for heat and seclusion. There are plenty of places that will let you hold alligators. It's not by default a bad thing.

But if the mouths aren't banded, that shows they don't care about the animal's safety or yours.

endgame was so basic. what if when the avengers confronted thanos on his farm he was like "they said it would work. they said I would be happy" and it turned out he was just a puppet for some higher, more terrifying power. whoever it was had taken advantage of thanos' madness and strength and used him. the film could have been about hunting down this entity and after years of searching, they find out it was the grandmaster and his brother the collector, two of the oldest beings in the universe. at this point the avengers are desperate and they can't understand why the brothers would have done this. they need closure, they need a reason, and it turns out, after all that, the brothers were bored. they're millions of years old and life had been getting dull so they wanted to stir the pot, mix things up a bit, so they spent thousands of years plotting an elaborate plan. they ignited the fire and watched it burn. that's it. how would the avengers of handled that? to know that that trillions of lives were snuffed out of existence because of the tediousness of immortality? what would happen next?

I was seized with a primal need to know what this bird looks like and I'm not sure what I was expecting but:

I am EXTREMELY pleased with everything about this animal.

zoreta Follow

I looked up why the eggs are like that.

This family is OUT THERE. There will be two single-sex flocks that are bonded- any female can fuck any male from the bonded flock, and vice versa, but NOT outsiders.

But the males and females don't flock together- it's two single-sex flocks that exclusively fuck each other.

So how exactly does brooding work?

A female lays her eggs in leaf litter, and her job is done. She peaces out, and assumes a male will happen to find them and adopt them like Bruce Wayne finding a plucky orphan. The odds it's actually the father are astronomical, btw.

But at the same time, nesting is somewhat communal. If a pregnant female finds an existing nest, she's likely to add her own eggs to it and peace out herself.

Imagine if Bruce Wayne left to do Batmanning, and came home to find another orphan just appeared and is playing smash with the Robins. And he didn't question it because that's his life. THAT IS THESE BIRDS.

Now you may be wondering, how does that explain why these eggs are gaudy as hell?

The current theory is it's so they're a visual beacon for other females to find. The bigger the egg pile, the harder it will be for a predator to eat all of them. So everybody loses a few of their eggs, but nobody loses all of them.

Plus bright eggs are more likely to be found by a Bruce Wayne birb!

theres a theory that the reason there are so many characters in folk tales who weave/spin is because weavers/spinners were bored while they were doing the repetitive work that doesnt require much brain power for experienced workers. e.g. the greek fates, rumpelstiltskin, sleeping beauty pricking her finger on a spindle.

so the weavers/spinners were telling stories to pass the time and then they were like 'yo but what if WE were in it.'

also interesting that making up a story as you tell it is called 'spinning a tale' the things that ticked me off are 1. the fucking MUSIC. 2. the recorder made no effort to stop it 3. the location the hawk came from is off-screen. it looks like it was tossed down on to the chicken, and although nothing got hurt, this is needless endangerment of both the chicken, chicks, and the hawk. I wouldn't be surprised if this came from one of those fake rescue YouTube channels. this is ridiculously cruel.

also, at y'all saying "it's no surprise chickens are descended from dinosaurs!" - they're not descended from dinosaurs! they ARE dinosaurs, as is the hawk. all birds are dinosaurs. just a fun fact to finish off a horrible post xenorat Follow

1. Music is added in post. You can have multiple audio channels while editing a video
2. Wings are not clipped, it's clearly molting
3. It wasn't tossed, the shadow shows it coming out of a dive maneuver before the hawk itself comes into frame
4. If it had been tossed, it wouldn't be aiming for one of the chicks in particular.

Looks like an inexperienced young predator bit off more than it could chew and panicked. Taking off from the ground isn't that easy, especially while your head feathers are getting yanked out and you're being beaten by wings, it was trying to get some distance before flying upwards and it didn't work out well.

One could argue it's suspicious that the person just happened to be filming at the right moment and calmly captured the whole encounter instead of flailing the camera around, yelling, or intervening, but that's hardly proof of anything. Some people are just unflappable.

Anyway, literally every single one of the arguments you made was bullshit.

I was right on the mark: it's one of those fake rescue channels done for easy money, there are countless of these going around, and I had two other videos on different channels featuring (potentially) the same bird. this should be the end of this response as it's self explanatory but I'll go into more detail in case people aren't aware. these videos are blatantly staged, often reusing the same animals and showcasing completely improbable circumstances. the situation of a hawk diving on chickens is not particularly unusual so it makes sense nobody would bat an eye, but it doesn't change the fact that that bird was not diving, it was either tossed or trying to come down from a higher perch. either way, the bird is incapable of flying, either because of a poor moult, or more likely, intentional tampering.

this bird has no fucking wing feathers anymore (hawks do not have simultaneous moults)

I have noticed that there are quite a few white supremacist (and their ideology) active in Norse Paganism.

So my question would be for POC who are interested in Norse paganism or even just casually in the mythology.

Do you feel welcome in the community, or you feel like you can't interact with the gods? When you research do you find mostly racist propaganda? (cause I personally had)

I don't often hear POC stories with Norse paganism.

This article by the Atlantic also talked about racism in the community and discusses what is happening if any one is interested.

It's important to know that hijab is banned in schools in most of the european countries, such as france, belgium, switzerland etc. Millions of girls have to take their hijab off everyday in order to have access to education, and I am one of them. Please spread this as much as possible, it has become so normal here that I feel like a fool for even mentioning it, but I'm pretty sure it goes against the human rights. This senseless law has been on since 2004 and pretends that all the students have to be "equal" and it is prohibited to show that you belong to any religion, any religious sign must be set aside. However, most of us have to take our hijab off in schools where you can clearly see a christmas tree or a christian cross. "Yeah but it's not the same", they say. Tell me about double standards. I pray for days when we don't have to chose between religion and education.

This tiktok about someone's pre-transition self is so so SO tender and I just want anyone who has transitioned and may be mourning their old self to see this and to know it's okay. It's okay to miss that person you once were, it's okay to wish you had embraced what you had and who you were before transitioning. It doesn't mean you regret it, and it doesn't mean you made the wrong decisions.

It's okay to think about that person, it's okay to mourn them, and it's okay to wonder. The person you were before transitioning may have been a trick of the light, but it doesn't mean they weren't special while they were here.

Everyone's experience is different... but if you find yourself feeling this, just know it's okay. You don't have to completely block out every aspect and memory of who you were before. It's okay if you do, but you don't have to.

15 Men React To The Idea Of Taking Their Wife's Last Name After Marriage

By Mélanie Berliet · View Comments · 🗨️

5. "There's something so emasculating about the notion of a man washing away his name altogether. The thought makes me uncomfortable, and kind of angry."

8. “No way. Rationale? It’s half a biological impulse, and half a contextual thing. Biologically, the word ‘domain’ keeps popping into my head. That sounds misogynistic, I know. But at my core, when all is said and done, I believe that the family is my domain. For instance, in any hypothetical state of emergency, I’m going to be the one to sacrifice my life to save my wife and children. I should be the one whose name lives on.”

— Raul, 29

12. “Listen, I’m a feminist. But we have to draw the line somewhere. Equal rights shouldn’t come at the cost of upending all established conventions. Why get married at all if you don’t want to embrace the related traditions?”

— Elijah, 27

14. “I have some friends out west who’ve done the combo last name thing for the baby, and that seems fair. Starting a new lineage is kind of cool. But taking her name? That’s not fair. That’s just lame. No thanks.”

— Ethan, 30

Asdfgdgjfflhlkj If we were to look at this ‘biologically’, men would be the ones taking the women’s surname hands down. See, children get all of their mtDNA (mitochondrial dna) from their mother and none from their father - where as their normal DNA is a 50:50 mix of both their mother’s and father’s. This means that mtDNA remains unchanged as it’s passed down from mum to daughter. This goes on for generations, in fact, genealogists can trace back lineages for millions of years using mtDNA.

However, the father’s dna is diluted with every generation, and soon becomes unrecognizable. The mother’s biologically legacy lasts the longest and that’s the tea

 acquiredalias Follow

Reblogging for the last comment. My sister works in genealogy, identifying any female living relatives of missing soldiers. The men don't matter. Why? Because the female family member's DNA can be traced back GENERATIONS with no decay. When bodies (generally from vietnam or Korean wars) are recovered, they then can finding living female biological relatives, no matter how distantly related, to positively identify the remains.

How a single Tumblr post turned this unknown book into a bestseller

Earlier this year Yahoo bought Tumblr for $1 billion. That was pretty shocking to many onlookers in the business world, who thought the community had no real substance.

But anyone who dismisses the value of Tumblr as a promotional and marketing tool might want to ask author Cory O'Brien what he thinks. When Tumblr discovered his book, Zeus Grants Stupid Wishes, the community turned it into a viral sensation and overnight bestseller.

At least 65% of women in the U.S. wear a size 14 or above, but most stores only carry up to a size 14.

My name is Nadia Boujarwah and I'm a co-founder of Dia & Co. a home try-on based personal styling service for plus size women.

We send them curated boxes of clothing, so every box has five pieces of clothing or accessories in it.

Those are pieces that a stylist will choose for her based on all the information that she shares with us.

And she gets to try everything on kind of in the context of her own wardrobe and in the comfort of her own home.

If this were around during the time that I hated myself. If this were here, and I had clothes that I could love myself in ...

I feel like I would have had so much more confidence in a time of my life where I had none.

And so I think it's awesome that we now have it

That's what brings me here, I want to be able to empower ... girls who, I read their profiles, are 16, 17 years old who already hate themselves

dean wasn't sure if angels felt emotions in the same way as humans do (thank u jensen for this headcanon). he knows that they don't experience senses in the same way because cas can eat but doesn't, not just because he doesn't need to as an angel but because it tastes like molecules to him which he finds gross. see: the sam & cas pb&j talk in 9.11. "i can taste every molecule." "not the sum of it's parts, huh?" "it's overwhelming. it's disgusting." dean doesn't know if angels feel the same emotions as humans and i think he kinda sees the way cas experiences humanity briefly and thinks, huh. he's feeling and doing all this stuff that as a human that dean thinks he could never do/feel as an angel.

but it's not that cas can't do human stuff, he just experiences it differently. dean lumps all human stuff into one category and says well, i guess that's off the table now because i'm human stuff. except dean is not a pb&j. cas cannot enjoy pb&j as an angel because it can be broken down into it's constituent parts. there's like, a molecular recipe to pb&j and if u add it together the product will always be pb&j. but if you add together all of dean's molecules you don't get dean, you get his physical form. because humans are more than the sum of their parts, and just adding together molecules doesn't get you consciousness and so you can't actually break down a person into distinct parts. what is necessary for love is that mysterious emergence that creates consciousness, and so cas may be unable to understand what he's feeling initially because he has no framework for understanding it at first but what he's feeling for dean is constant whether he's an angel or not. cas could take any form and still feel that same love for dean because dean can't be broken into pieces without becoming not-dean, and so he can always experience that love because dean is not a pb&j. even if he may despairingly think so.

Okay, people are being idiots in the comments so a few thoughts:

People are all up in arms like "but being overweight IS unhealthy! So it's okay to throw a fit whenever we see overweight people on a cover!" You know what else is unhealthy and really bad for you? Not sleeping enough as a habit. There's a whole bunch of issues associated with that. Oh, and what about not washing your hands after using the bathroom? Not only can they get diseases, they can spread them to others and make them super sick! The other people could even die! That's awful, right?

But do you throw fits and yell at random strangers when you overhear them talking about pulling all-nighters? Do you chase someone down when it looks like their hands aren't wet coming out of the bathroom? No? Because that would be crossing a line, hmm? Because you don't want to make a scene? Weird that you feel empowered to crusade against overweight people and openly shame them, can't imagine why that might be.

What else is unhealthy...let's see...oh yeah eating disorders! Those are super deadly and have permanent effects on your body! They can be incredibly difficult to recover from and the person has to be vigilant during recovery. But I'm sure your invasive and rude comments couldn't possibly trigger anything in this person, right? I mean, you're basically their doctor, you know them so well! You are perfectly qualified as an expert to make comments about their health and weight, and can rest assured it has no potential to give them one of the most deadly mental disorders people can get. I'm sure you know that person well and are being supportive and understanding in whatever health journey they're on. I'm sure your comments will only spur them into healthy, nontoxic behaviors! Shame 'em on social media, that's what therapists recommend to encourage change! Look at you go!

I get out of breath walking up stairs because I am incredibly out of shape. I barely sleep consistently, and I often sit eating junk food. And yet, weirdly, despite being very open about this, people seem to dismiss this and say I'm healthy and in shape, that they can tell just by looking at me! So strange! They don't take pictures and shame me for my pizza, they don't side-eye me when I say I've never been to a gym, they don't give me unsolicited advice as I wheeze up my second flight of stairs. Maybe that's because I still fit society's expectation of what people should look like and that's what this was really about, not about being healthy. Maybe people only feel entitled to openly criticize and berate people they secretly find ugly.

Being healthy is about what you do, not what you look like. There are thin people with incredibly unhealthy habits and yet, strangely, when someone insanely thin is on a magazine cover, we don't see nearly the amount of vitriol and disgust pouring out. Because at least you still think they're hot, right? And that makes any unhealthy stuff all okay! After all, you'd hate to be a bully making them feel bad about how they look right? And really, you don't know their metabolism and habits, you'd hate to judge without knowing.

We equate thin with healthy and fat with unhealthy and decide that being overweight means that person no longer deserves respect, support, or joy, that they should never feel beautiful. It's okay for people to be attracted to them, it's okay for them to be happy or proud. Your health doesn't have anything to do with that. We stand and scream at them for not hiding in self hatred and self disgust and shame and then pat ourselves on the back for being helpful people who care about them.

 madgastronomer Follow

The above person mostly has good points, BUT BEING FAT IS NOT UNHEALTHY, FUCK OFF WITH THAT.

i don't think they said being fat is unhealthy? i think they said society equates fatness with being unhealthy

Mine blockade sparks solidarity protests across Nunavut

Demonstrations started in Pond Inlet last week. New protests were held Monday in Iqaluit, Igloolik, Nauyasat and Taloyoak.

Residents in the western Nunavut community of Taloyoak come out on Monday to show support for the community of Pond Inlet. A blockade started last week at the Mary River Mine to protest an expansion that communities nearby say will harm the land and wildlife. (Submitted by Mary Sutherland)

Baffinland Iron Mines Corporation wants to double its annual mining output to 12 million tonnes. To do this, it would build a railway and increase shipping through its port at Milne Inlet. The waters surrounding the port are a crucial habitat for narwhal in the Canadian Arctic.

Community members across Nunavut came out in peaceful protests Monday [8 February 2021], to show solidarity with a group [...] who continue to blockade the Mary River iron ore mine on North Baffin Island. Protesters at the blockade from Pond Inlet, Igloolik and Arctic Bay say Inuit harvesting rights are being ignored in the company's bid to expand the mine. Demonstrations started in Pond Inlet last week. New protests were held Monday in Iqaluit, Igloolik, Nauyasat and Taloyoak. Elder Annie Nattaq called for the protest in Nunavut's capital. Since 5 February, seven hunters have created a makeshift barrier of snowmobiles and sleds to block the airstrip and service road of the Mary River ore mine, halting operations. Temperatures in recent days have dipped to the low -30sC. At issue are controversial plans drawn up by the mine's operator Baffinland Iron Mines Corporation to double output. To bring 12m tonnes of iron ore to market, the mine has said it needs to build a railway to a port near the community of Pond Inlet. [...] "Baffinland is making money and we are given very little money and we know that money will not bring back wildlife," Tom Naqitarvik said in an Inuktitut language video posted to Facebook, reported CBC News.

Inuit protestors blocked the airstrip and access road of the Mary River iron ore mine in North Baffin Island on Feb. 4, forcing a stop to mining [...]. Inuit in the two closest communities – Pond Inlet and Arctic Bay – have said they are joining the protestors with supplies.

Baffinland, the owners of the mine, have been seeking to double production from six to 12 million tonnes annually and put in a railway to aid shipping. They have been applying to the Nunavut Impact Review Board [NIRB] to make this move since 2014, when the mine opened for business.

Many Inuit in the area say that since more mine ships started arriving, whales and seals have been harder to find. Near the mine site, bright red iron dust makes clean snow look like a Prince Edward Island dirt road. Many fear that the proposed railway will scare off caribou, which are already very hard to find on Baffin Island even with strict quotas in place.

While the protestors held the mine in lockdown, their community members made their case to the three person NIRB panel. Caleb Sangoya [...] has been writing down his observations about wildlife around the Mary River since 2009, when the idea of a mine was proposed. "Baffinland says no drop has taken place," said Sangoya in Inuktitut. "From our observation, no way. When there's ship traffic, mammals start to move away."

Scientists will keep a close eye on this variant to see if it is a better spreader than others.

WWW.BBC.COM

This is “mutation” in action. Viruses are constantly mutating, millions of times a day. Most of the time, the mutation is close enough to the original that it’s a no-op in terms of how the body responds to it. Occasionally, the mutations are significant enough to change events out here in the human world. The “first wave” of the Spanish Flu killed a lot of people; then it mutated into the virulent “second wave” variant that killed a massive amount of people; then it mutated into a form that could no longer transmit – and kill – human to human. It’s what viruses do.

But how does it happen? To understand that, it’s important to understand how viruses reproduce themselves. Here’s a Cliff Notes version, and I invite correction and amplification from people who know a hell of a lot more about such things than I do.

Okay, first thing to understand: viruses are not living organisms. Viruses are kind of weird little machines. Those “machines” have one and only one goal: to reproduce themselves as widely as possible. Imagine a Rona virus, floating along in your bloodstream. It spots a blood cell. As it passes, it uses basically “grappling hooks” to latch on to that blood cell. Then it has a kind of “needle” that it uses to puncture the blood cell wall. It injects material which is just a set of instructions. Instructions to do one and only one thing: make copies of itself. Those self-assembling instructions use the material in the cell to manufacture copies of the virus. Millions of copies. Eventually the blood cell bursts from all the virus copies crowding inside, releasing all those virus copies into the bloodstream, where every single one of those copies repeats the process. Pretty damned impressive process for a thing that isn’t even alive.

“Yeah, yeah, old man. You said you’d tell us about mutations! Cut to the fucking chase!!!”

I’m getting to it jfc. Okay, so here’s where mutation comes into play. So remember the part where the virus injects a set of instructions to make copies of itself? Sometimes “copy errors” happen. Imagine typing away on your phone or in MS Word without autocorrect. Viruses make the same “copy errors” you’d make between your brain and your screen: you meant to type

but actually typed

ATTAGGAGACATTTAGATT

When the “instructions” assemble a copy of the original virus, it’s going to be different because the “assembly instructions” got corrupted during the process. Happens all the time. In the course of, for example, COVID working its way through the victim’s system, millions of copy errors occur. And when that modified copy creates its own new multitude of copies, most of them will have “copy errors” also. And a mutated virus can sometimes behave differently than its predecessors. Spanish Flu mutated from deadly “first wave” to very deadly “second wave” and then mutated to seemingly “disappeared,” only to hide out in reservoir species and reemerge in deadly form 90 years later as the “swine flu” (H1N1, the same “species” of virus as the Spanish Flu). For those 90 years the virus was busily mutating inside those reservoir species until it finally came calling again as a mutation that could kill humans.

You ever think about how old people have no idea what “survivor bias” is, and take full credit for being excellent out of things where they lucked out?

“Back in my day we didn’t have any of these childhood protective things, we were smart enough not to do stupid shit on our own!” Except your little neighbour, who got the funniest idea at the age of seven, and got his skull pierced when he slipped?

“Back in my day nobody got divorced, we stuck together and fixed our problems!”

What about your cousin, who was slowly killed by her husband because she had nowhere to escape him?

“Back in my day nobody had ‘mental problems’, we didn’t whine, we just toughed it out and endured life!”

Hey remember that guy you used to work with, who seemed really friendly and normal, and then suddenly hanged himself ‘for no reason’?

“Back in my day we didn’t have any of this ‘gay’ or ‘transgender’ thing.”

You did, but your family cut all ties with her before you were born.

You kinda start seeing it in everything they think, if you start looking for it.

Hundreds of 'predatory' journals indexed on leading scholarly database

Scopus has stopped adding content from most of the flagged titles, but the analysis highlights how poor-quality science is infiltrating literature.

The widely used academic database Scopus hosts papers from more than 300 potentially 'predatory' journals that have questionable publishing practices, an analysis has found¹. Together, these titles contributed more than 160,000 articles over three years — almost 3% of the studies indexed on Scopus during the period. Their presence on Scopus and other popular research databases raises concerns that poor-quality studies could mislead scientists and pollute the scientific literature.

"There are potentially serious consequences of predatory articles being indexed in scientific databases," says Anna Severin, a sociologist who studies peer review at the University of Bern and has written about predatory journals infiltrating citation databases². "Researchers might base their further research on poor-quality or even fabricated findings and cite these in their own publications, thereby further distributing untrustworthy science," says Severin, who wasn't involved in the latest study.

Lottie is Gay and Doesn't Know It

1. She is exclusively attracted to princes, despite having never met one.

She won't even DANCE with boys at her party who aren't princes despite thinking they're good boys who would treat girls well (she advises the boy she doesn't want to dance with to find someone eager to dance with him, rather than tell him to go home).

To me this comes across as her choosing "prince" as the ideal that she finds attractive solely because it's theoretical, the imaginary Perfect Boy who doesn't exist. This is common among young people who aren't exposed to homosexuality but don't feel attraction to people like they're "supposed" to.

2. She's never comfortable around Naveen, always thinking about things that have or could go wrong.

Part of this self-consciousness is obviously because he's a fake, but even when she's set for marriage and all her dreams are coming true she's antsy and upset and lashes out at her dad while trying to over-please the fake Naveen.

She also glances nervously at the priest right before the pronunciation, as though still dwelling on things that could go wrong rather than her happy moment—and this is the scene in which she's been the MOST visibly relaxed with the prince.

She's realized something's wrong with HER not feeling attracted to the prince, despite him being "perfect" for all intents and purposes, and she doesn't know why that is.

3. She doesn't kiss Naveen right away despite saying in the opening that she'd kiss 100 frogs if it meant becoming a real princess.

I would do it, I would kiss a frog.

Tiana interrupts her sure but only AFTER she's been counting and recounting Naveen's story back to him. She's stalling because she doesn't want to lock herself into another marriage with someone she's not attracted to.

Goodness gracious.
This is so much to absorb.

4. She doesn't actually want to marry a prince, she just wants to be a princess. When she's proposed to she barely pays any attention to her rapidly-transforming, lying fiancée because she's so enamored with the image of herself as royalty. She actually shoves him away.

5. She's absolutely in love with Tiana and still doesn't know it.

She compliments Tiana more than any man in the film. She respects all of Tiana's life decisions even if she doesn't even slightly understand them because of their different perspectives, supports her dream of a restaurant even if she doesn't share it, and is willing to give up potential romance with a prince, the thing she has dreamed about all her life, at the drop of a hat to comfort a humiliated Tiana.

And then there's this line.

Charlotte La Bouff is only actually willing to kiss a prince if it means her best friend Tiana's dreams will all come true.

Fuck, this reminds me of this good post I saw on I believe Twitter. Can't find it and even so I'd rather not repost it if it can be helped but it was basically some dude crawling into bed w/ his girlfriend/wife and he was clearly upset and she offers him sex to make him feel better but he declines so instead she cuddles him and he starts crying and says thank you. Super cute and sweet.

My boyfriend cried in my arms

My Boyfriends is pretty masculine, wears a Beard and is pretty Buff and not the kind of guy that is super into cozy stuff.

So one night we took a bath together and I sat behind him and started washing him. He was a bit defensive at first but started to relax after some time. I massaged his Head and washed his hair, kissed his neck. We didn't had Sex or something I just felt that he needed some love and some body contact. After the Bath we didn't talk we just kind of communicated without words. We went to the Bedroom and we laid down. He laid his head on my chest and i put my arm around him. After sometime I grabbed a Book from my Nightstand and started reading to him while stroking his hair with my fingers. After some time i noticed that he was crying. I didn't say anything just put the book aside and hugged him really tight and kissed his forehead. He just said a really quite "Thank you" and fell asleep on my chest.

I just wanted to share and tell you guys because I think that doesn't matter how "Manly" a guy is or how thug he acts they are all just Humans after all and need love and care too. We do this now at least once every 2 weeks and he really loves it and our relationship was never so intimit and loving.

Okay so yes we need to put more money into education in the US but y'all this SPECIFIC line of thinking has much less to do with public education and everything to do with the evangelical war on science. This exact "earth age" rhetoric isn't the result of dumb people, its being taught in Christian schools and touted in evangelical churches. Evangelical lobbies help pass laws that force states to teach creationism alongside evolution. Millions are spent every year by evangelical institutions to convince partitions that science is lying to them, to force them to belive the only place they can find truth is the church. Creationism is just another facet of that and acting like it just "Americans are dumb" rather than a pointed, purposeful campaign to keep people in a what amounts to a cult, is not oy disingenuous, its dangerous

I've been having a hard time figuring out how to word this, specifically because I don't know how to get at the idea that's specifically bothering me without opening a conversation about a dozen other interweaving issues. so please bare in mind that what I'm saying is in the context of a broader set of issues that I'm not specifically going to get into here (or at least I'm gonna try not to).

to rip the band aid off, I'm uncomfortable with the fact that trans men have been so minimized in discussions about transphobia and specifically pitted against trans women (as if recognizing their own oppression somehow takes oppression away from trans women) to the point that trans men can't talk about their oppression in their own spaces without having to minimize themselves.

this isn't unique to trans men nor is it one-sided, but the normalization of it not just in lgbt+ spaces but on tumblr in General is just mind-boggling.

like even taking the common justifications and logic behind this at face value it's Blatantly clear that there's a specific bias in play against trans men. like, it's insisted that trans men don't experience misogyny because they are men and therefor they are less oppressed. gay men are men and therefore don't face misogyny, so it stands to reason that they are less oppressed than lesbians how many posts about the generalized hatred of non-heterosexuality is specifically referred to as lesbophobia and nothing else. how many posts calling out lesbophobia reminds people that what's being described could never happen to gay men. how often has a gay man had to derail a post talking about his experiences to clarify that he Knows lesbians are more oppressed than he is or else face the possibility of people getting angry at him for trying to insist that he's more oppressed than them Because he's speaking up at all.

recognizing the existence of gay men and their oppression is not treated like a threat to lesbians and their oppression. we all know that it's important to recognize the differences in experiences between gay men and lesbians but we don't use those differences as an excuse to speak over or silence gay men. (or rather, it's called as being wrong when it Does happen.)

the constant minimization here isn't being used to remind people of where we need to allocate our funds in non-profits or to remind people be Mindful of groups of people who face multiple axis' of oppression, it's being used to silence people and push them out of their spaces.

trans men are put in boxes and shaken Far More than their cis counterparts are in the wider community, and I wouldn't be the first person to point out that it's terf logic being applied to trans people with the caveat of believing the trans person is correct about their gender. I think that's also why people jump to the opposite so quickly. people who've internalized Men Bad Horrible Invaders and cope with that by pointing it at another target would feel threatened by that target insisting that they're wrong specifically Because they were already afraid of it being used against them. it's understandable but it isn't actually appropriate.

the fact that rowling's terf manifesto explicitly targeted trans men (and specifically trans men's reproductive health) while she's Only been called out for transmisogyny is a problem. the fact that trans men have to grovel and minimize their experiences to be allowed to talk without incident is a problem. the fact that people are allowed to just Announce that specific experiences Exclude trans men without being challenged is a problem (and the fact that people who Do challenge it are painted as the ones doing the silencing is just fucking gross).

none of this is me saying that trans men are inherently more oppressed than trans women, but that at this point I think just asking the question is harmful to the conversation we're trying to have. it isn't useful when talking about individual experiences because individual people are going to have their experiences whether it's more or less likely to happen to them or not. an individual trans woman isn't "inherently" more or less oppressed than an individual trans man because their identities don't dictate their lived experiences on their own.

all we've done is hurt and isolate people in our bid to "prove" that they're the loser here. it is, for instance, A Lot More Difficult to have a nuanced discussion about trans men's experiences with misogyny and how those experiences evolve over time and affect our relationship with our gender and ourselves when half of the live studio audience is angry that we've suggested that trans men have experiences with misogyny at all

how I fixed my sleep schedule

(7 tips from a reformed sleeper)

@noodledesk

2 night alarms

I set 2 alarms—one an hour before I want to fall asleep, and one 30 min before that as a reminder to wrap up what I'm doing.

turning the wi-fi off

I turn my Wi-Fi off at around 9PM, and when I'm done getting ready for bed, read on my e-reader until sleep. No Wi-Fi = no notifications to respond to. Minimize your traps!
↳ BUT U CAN STILL GET CALLS!

reading

I do this because I love reading and because it's part of a routine that sets me up to feel sleepy. I'll read for around 30 min to an hour before I sleep.

gradual changes

Don't try to move your sleep time up 4 hours. Do it in 15 minute increments per day. Baby steps, or it'll be unrealistic and you'll have trouble falling asleep.

How much sleep makes you feel good and well-rested? Experiment with the length that works for you so you know how much to sleep and how long it takes you to fall asleep when doing your planning.

If you set rules, don't break them. If you really want to change your sleep schedule you can't be soft about it! It's really hard to change when you sleep, otherwise you'd just automatically do it.

a good reason

It's really hard to disrupt your schedule. Especially if you're trying to sleep earlier, and all of your friends are not. I sleep early because having time to myself in the morning helps me stay focused, creative, and relaxed.

last year i used to sleep from 5 am to 10 am every day and it was Not Good for me. i've gotten a couple of questions about my sleep schedule so i thought i'd share some tips that helped me adopt a healthier sleep schedule. enjoy 🐇💤

Turkish Photographer Beats Up Client After Learning Bride Is 15 Years Old

His name is Onur Albayrak! Here's the story.

Hurriyet Daily News reports that Albayrak had been hired to photograph the July 5th wedding at Turgut Özal Nature Park in the eastern Turkish province of Malatya. On the day of, when he noticed that the bride-to-be didn't look like an adult, he asked the groom her age and learned that she was only 15.

"The groom had come to my studio some two weeks ago and was alone," Albayrak tells the Daily News. "I saw the bride for the first time at the wedding. She's a child, and I felt her fear because she was trembling."

Albayrak then reportedly refused to continue as the wedding photographer and attempted to stop the wedding.

The argument soon turned physical when the groom attacked him as he was attempting to leave, Albayrak says. The photographer ended up breaking the client's nose in the fight, according to local reports.

Albayrak confirmed the reports in a Facebook post, which has been met with widespread approval, attracting thousands of Likes and hundreds of overwhelmingly positive comments.

"I wish this had never happened, but it did," Albayrak writes. "And if you were to ask me if I'd do the same thing again, I'd say 'yes.' Child brides are [victims] of child abuse and no power on earth can make me photograph a child in a wedding gown."

The legal minimum age for marriage in Turkey is 18-years-old for both sexes, and child marriage is punishable by imprisonment for men who marry underage girls. Despite being outlawed, however, child marriage is still prevalent in the country and remains a controversial political issue.

btw - let's remind ourselves, americans, that unlike turkey, in the US the legal minimum age for marriage is only 18 in two states. in alabama, you can be married as young as fourteen years old if you have "parental permission". in california, you can get married under 18 if you go to counseling, have a parent with you when you apply for the marriage license, and appear before a judge. in some states, there isn't even a specific minimum age for marriage.

the minimum marriage age for girls in new hampshire is 13 years old.

48 states allow child marriage.

child marriage is not an "over there" problem, it happens right here, legally. any one of us might find ourselves called upon to break somebody's nose if we encounter something like this occurring. we also have a responsibility to support groups and laws trying to end child marriage in this country.

her specific jump from bollywood to hollywood has given her a unique voice and position that a lot of westerners simply do not understand. in india, she's from the elite. she's born and bred into the highest class of bollywood royalty, her family history is tied to the military which constantly seeks to go to war against pakistan as well as oppressing the muslim community and other religious minorities in india. her ties to the disgustingly rich ambanis who have made their billions off the backs of poor indians and have terrible business practices, and the prime minister modi who is a staunch hindu nationalist who believes in and has been consistently making moves towards expelling all religious minorities from the country - not exactly woke kween behaviour relocating to america means all these white people writing think pieces about how hashtag woke it is that this brown woman, from an oppressed minority, is the lead in her own tv show. she's constantly asked about representation and taking up space in the industry as a brown woman. but that's all meaningless coming from her - she's never lived as an oppressed minority in america or anywhere, but it's allowed her to co opt a #movement of #wokeness that the west loves. it means that her rampant blatant and dangerous islamophobia and imperialism is allowed to go unchecked because there's no understanding at all of where she comes from and what she stands for in india.

it's fully our responsibility as desi diaspora to speak out on this to educate fellow westerners, and to uplift the voices of desi activists in the homeland speaking out about what's happening right now. i know it seems trivial in the face of what's actually happening in kashmir, but i think perception is everything and in the west if this one singularly famous south asian person trivialises the matter without being called out, it really does shape how people here see the issue just in case anyone else wants to act a complete fucking fool on this post i made years ago that's getting notes again: modi is evil, islamophobia is rampant and literally killing muslims every day in india, kashmir and around the world, "hindu rights" have literally never been at risk so shut the fuck up, and kashmir deserves sovereignty and peace unconditionally. you have anything else to say, catch this block.

policy makers. Sometimes, people mix the two up. Sometimes, we garner a crowd and tell people what we think the right thing to do is, but there has to be a bifurcation between people who actually change laws and influencers."

Does she ever mix the two up? In August 2019, Chopra Jonas certainly provoked people when she tweeted "Jai Hind" - meaning "Victory to India" or "Long live India" - alongside the hashtag #IndianArmedForces after a series of airstrikes by India that triggered a response from Pakistan and resulted in an escalation in hostilities between the nuclear-armed countries. Pakistan's human rights minister, Shireen Mazari, said Chopra should have been sacked from her Unicef role for her pro-war comments. Was that tweet an example of her using her influence irresponsibly, or was she glad she said it because she was being honest?

Dana answers on her behalf: "Simon, if we could move on, that would be ideal. I don't want to put Priyanka in a position where she disappeared. In the book, Chopra Jonas, who is worth an estimated £35m, talks about the importance of networking to get ahead. When she found herself staying in the same hotel as Narendra Modi, India's rightwing, populist, Hindu nationalist prime minister, she took advantage of the opportunity to arrange a meeting with him. Was that because she admired his politics, or because she thought such a powerful man could help her? "Neither," she says, tersely. "It was because he's the prime minister of the country that I'm a citizen of. We just happened to be in the same hotel and I had met the prime minister previously at some social event and I had time in the morning and that was it. It was really very simple." Modi later attended her wedding.

In 2019, she told the Times that she would love to do his job one day. "Oh, I was being tongue in cheek," she says. It didn't sound as if she was joking, I say. "I consider myself apolitical as much as I can be. I prefer to be a humanitarian."

We need to better educate kids on the importance of animals that are typically hated because otherwise you end up with adults who think hating wasps is a personality.

Trufax: hatred of wasps is so widespread that it's prevalent among biologists as well. An entire field full of people getting excited about species that nobody else has heard of, and many have collectively decided that wasps don't need to be researched, even though they're threatened by the same things that are threatening bees, and disappearance of wasps will spell bad things for the number of pests found in gardens and farms.

I have a friend wasp named Queeny. She built her nest on a really inconvenient area where I often dump my birds' uneaten seed or shake towels out. She would come out angrily and buzz at us, ready to defend her home from the strange giants.

Queeny didn't know that it was our porch she built her home on, she saw a nice ledge and decided that it was a suitable spot to begin her life as a lone female.

So instead of removing the nest and poisoning her with bug spray, you know what I did? I moved the area where I dump my things and started feeding her. I would tap three times on the railing before leaving a treat like fruit, honey, dog food, or pesky beetles I find in my garden, then move away to give them lots of space. At first she would buzz out, wings spread and ready to fight, but after doing this for just a few days...she stopped!

Now when she comes out, it's slowly and non-threateningly. She tilts her head at me before gingerly inspecting the offerings. She doesn't threaten my mom any more either, she's learned that we mean no harm. We've started using that ledge to shake sheets out and dump bird seed and she doesn't mind at all! She just watches quietly.

She even has a family now! Five daughters and one lad- a husband or son, not sure which lmao -who greet us the same, she must've taught them that we're not enemies (or they just grew up used to us). They even protect my garden, since Queeny's family has grown the invasive Japanese beetle population has plummeted! They really are delightful neighbors.

There have been studies that prove wasps (paper wasps, Polistes fuscatus specifically) and honeybees can recognize human faces. Other wasps and bees likely can as well, it was just Polistes fuscatus that was studied more closely.

If you're a dick to them, they'll remember that.

If you're nice to them, they'll remember that as well.

Yellowjackets seem to have some ability to do it as well; my parents purposely started leaving out dishes of jam and cut up fruit for a massive underground nest they had no possible hope of eradicating (cabin in the middle of nowhere, no exterminators in the area, and as best they could guess they'd have to dig up the entire garden to get it all). Their aim was mostly to keep the hornets away from the areas people often ate or drank because any time food or sweet drinks were out, the hornets came over to basically hijack everything. Even then, any time people came out to eat, they went over to the table they set up near the garden to put out a mini-picnic for the hornets as well, which did pretty well at keeping them from harassing the people who were about 20 feet away.

The secondary aim was to hopefully get the big ol' colony to realize they weren't trying to start trouble after my dad got swarmed into the lake a few times for getting too close to a nest entrance he didn't even know was there.

After a few weeks of that, the hornets were pretty chill about people and my parents were able to figure out where the nest entrances were and just how much of the garden had tons and tons and tons of yellowjackets underneath it so they could move the plants somewhere else in the yard.

The colony is still there years later and probably larger now, the garden was mostly moved, and they still put food out for the hornets; about the only things that fight with the hornets now are orioles, who also want to eat the jelly and fruit and even they've sort of learned to share.

They're wary of but not aggressive toward new people giving them food but seem to sort of generally recognize people in general is, "They give us food, it's probably cool."

The nest entrances have been marked with staked red flags too so nobody accidentally gets too close.

Wasps are just like any other animal. If you leave them alone/let them know you're not a threat, they'll leave you alone. You gotta remember that wasps evolved with big critters like us breaking into their nests go eat their protein rich babies, and we're several hundred times their size - if they aren't attracted by your food they're scared of you, and when animals get scared they can get aggressive.

Friendly reminder to all wlw: u don't have to be butch OR femme. You can be both, neither, 55% butch and 45%, whatever, but you don't have to be one or the other if you don't want to. Those aren't the only options of expression for wlw

Butch and Femme are lesbian only terms

gnashingmyteeth-likeachildofcain

They aren't, they've been used by the black and latino working class lgbt community before upper middle class white lesbians decided we couldn't use them anymore and then later stole them. Stop viewing lgbt through a cis, white lens and if you're going to make fun of me, at least don't be a coward about it. :)

I'm begging white LGBT+ people to click these links and educate yourselves. I've been seeing so many white wlw erase Black and Brown history. I also encourage fellow Black and Brown LGBT+ folks to read up on our history. As someone who uses butch, and is Black, I wanna make sure everyone knows that butch and femme aren't lesbian only terms. There's even terms exclusive to Black LGBT+ folks as well. Do research about the history of stud and terms like bull dyke.

I'm tired of people pushing shit that was made up by white TERFs. If y'all care so much about queer history then fucking do the research and learn about how people of color influenced the community. We help build it after all. Don't y'all dare bring up Marsha P. Johnson but then erase Black LGBT+ history. Don't.
